

Maintenance Therapy

Services that are performed primarily to maintain range of motion or to provide positioning services for the patient do not qualify for occupational therapy services. These services can be provided to the child as part of a home program that can be implemented by the child's caregivers and do not necessarily require the skilled services of a physical or occupational therapist to perform safely and effectively.

